PREFACE AND CONTENTS.

PREFACE.

EXPERIENCE of the usefulness for office purposes of the Abstract of Charters and Documents printed as Appendices to the published volumes of Glasgow Charters and Records (1175-1833) has suggested the desirability of its continuance to a later date. From the year 1873 onwards all deeds of conveyance granted by the Magistrates and Council have been engrossed in Chartularies, while title-deeds of properties, other than those of the City Improvements Trust, have been regularly entered in descriptive Inventories. With regard to the Improvements Trust purchases, upwards of 800 in number by the end of 1872, these have from the first been registered in tabulated form and chronological order in what is called the Purchase Book, feús and sales of properties having been similarly entered in the Sales Book. In 1883 Purchase and Sales Books applicable to properties bought and sold by the Corporation and its other departments, so far as under the charge of the Town-Clerk, were also commenced, and the opportunity was embraced of making the entries in these books retrospective, so as to include 1873 and subsequent years. With such facilities for access to deeds granted subsequent to 1872 it has been considered unnecessary to continue the Abstract beyond that date.

During the period thus dealt with, in the course of which the population of the city was more than doubled, having risen from about 215,000 in 1833 to a figure estimated at half a million in 1872, the magistrates and council obtained from the legislature a series of enactments, unprecedented both in number and importance. Acts of Parliament for the continuance and enlargement of Police authority over the respective suburban districts were also passed during the short interval which elapsed before their absorption within the extended boundaries of the city. In securing police administration over such districts the lead had been taken by the barony of Gorbals, at the northern end of which, bordering on the River Clyde, stood the ancient village of "Brigend." The industrial community whose members possessed the cluster of dwellings in this locality had not for many generations passed far beyond their original bounds, and so long as such conditions prevailed the maintenance of order and good neighbourhood had been sufficiently attained through baronial supervision supplemented by that of a voluntary association of Feuars. But upon the division of the lands formerly possessed in common, and the transfer to Hutchesons' Hospital and the Trades House of their respective portions, the adjoining fields were laid out in building lots, which were readily acquired by enterprising Feuars. Dwellings were erected and occupied to such an extent that, within eight years after Glasgow got its first Police act, the inhabitants of the "villages" of Gorbals, Hutchesontown, Lauriston, and Tradeston, representing the great increase of inhabitants and the necessity of providing for a more regular administration of internal government, asked the assent of Glasgow Town Council for extension of the police establishment of the city over these districts, but on account of difficulties in adopting this course a special Police act for the barony was obtained in 1808. As parts of that act, such as the sections relating to assessments and appointment of commissioners, were to endure for fourteen years only, and as the statutory experiment had “produced the most beneficial consequences,” a renewal act for a similar period was passed in 1823. On the expiry of the latter term, it was considered expedient not only to continue the existing police supervision with added authority, but also to extend the powers and jurisdictions of the magistrates and commissioners over the whole area comprehended within the parliamentary boundaries of the city, so far as lying on the south side of the River Clyde (p. 7). By this extension large additions were made to the original area of the barony towards the east and west, but the jurisdiction of the Police commissioners was withdrawn from the portion of the barony situated to the south of the parliamentary boundary.¹ As thus altered by the act of 1837, and subject to the regulations and provisions contained in another act passed in 1843 (p. 21), the district remained under the charge of the “Commissioners of Police of the Barony of Gorbals” till it was incorporated within the city of Glasgow in 1846. The two burghs of barony, Calton and Anderston, likewise incorporated with the city in 1846, had also obtained renewal acts of parliament for the more efficient management of their affairs, the former in 1840 (p. 13) and the latter in 1843 (p. 23).

The entire municipal union of the various districts comprehended within the parliamentary boundary of the city had been strongly recommended by the commissioners on Municipal Corporation in their Report of 1835 (pp. 3, 4), but though the subject was from time to time under consideration and a small addition of territory had been made for Police purposes in 1843 (p. 22), it was not till 1846 that the municipal boundaries became co-extensive with those of the parliamentary area (pp. 30-32). By this measure, under which the separate suburban jurisdictions were terminated, the opportunity was taken of abolishing certain petty customs the levying of which was both irksome and costly while the revenue derived from that source was small in amount. The only other extension of boundaries within the period of the Abstract was that of 1872 (p. 148), whereby lands at Springhill, Alexandra Park, Gilmorehill, and other places, were incorporated within the city, making its total area a little over 6,000 acres.

By an act of parliament passed in 1772 heritors in the several parishes and magistrates of Royal Burghs, within the county of Lanark, were empowered to call upon those who were chargeable for maintaining highways to perform the necessary services, and by an amendment act passed in 1807 such services were commutable into money payments. From the first Glasgow citizens had met their statute "labour" obligations by means of money payments to a collector appointed by the magistrates and council, and by the latter act such revenues were directed to be applied in maintaining the streets, lanes, roads, and common sewers within the royalty. A third act passed in 1820 vested the power of levying and applying the Statute Labour money in a body of Trustees chosen by the Town Council, the Merchants House, and the Trades House, and this system was continued till the year 1837, when it became necessary to apply to Parliament for a renewal of the expiring Police Act of the city (pp. 6, 7). Under the provisions of the act then obtained, the management of the "Statute Labour" was transferred to the Police Board. This change having tended not only to the lessening of expense but also to improvement in the condition of the streets and common sewers, the amalgamation so effected was renewed in the Police Act of 1843 (pp. 22, 23). In accordance with the purpose of this act previous statutes were repealed and their provisions, as amended and adapted to the circumstances of the time, with many new enactments, were embodied in one comprehensive measure which was not wholly superseded till nearly twenty years had elapsed. But under the Municipal Extension Act of 1846 the powers of the Board of Police were transferred to a committee of the Town Council (pp. 31, 32), and by an act passed in 1856 powers were conferred for the better paving of the city (p. 61). By the Consolidation Act of 1862 previous statutes were formally repealed, but in effect their provisions, as amended, were renewed and appointed to be administered by a new body composed of certain members of the town council, and styled "The Board of Police of Glasgow ” (pp. 93, 94). Parliamentary Road, which had been formed under the authority of an act of parliament passed in 1825, and which was originally intended to be maintained out of the proceeds of rates or tolls levied from those using the thoroughfare, had not been a financial success, and seeing that the use of the street was advantageous to the public, it was, in 1865, transferred to the Police Board, who thereupon become liable for its maintenance (pp. 103-4). In the following year the Police Act of 1862, which contained a provision that it should continue in force for only a limited period, was repealed, and a substituted statute, most of the enactments in which are still in force, was passed “ to regulate the Police and Statute Labour of the city ” (p. 112).

The two water companies formed for supplying the inhabitants with water obtained from the River Clyde, one established in 1806 and the other two years later, persevered in their respective enterprises till the year 1838 when the Glasgow Water-works Company purchased the undertaking of the Cranstonhill Company (pp. 9, 10) and thus secured a monopoly of distributing water drawn from the Clyde under statutory authority. The supply, however, did not meet the wants of the public, and, in 1846, the company obtained parliamentary authority for introducing an additional supply of water from Loch Lubnaig, in the county of Perth (p. 29), but the works for that purpose were not carried out. Meanwhile the inhabitants of Gorbals and adjoining districts being inadequately provided with pure and wholesome water a company was formed for procuring a supply from the Brockburn and its tributary streams, in the parishes of Mearns, Neilston, and Eastwood, and an act authorising the necessary works was passed in 1846 (pp. 32, 33). The water procured in this way having added greatly to the comfort and prosperity of the district, and the burgh of Rutherglen and other towns and villages being desirous to partake in such privileges, an extension of the Gorbals works for that purpose was authorised in 1850 (p. 40); and on similar grounds, with regard to other places, further extensions were sanctioned in 1853 (pp. 49, 50). But on account of the great increase in Glasgow's population the water supplied from all sources, including the wells spread throughout the city, was deficient in quantity and to some extent its purity also was not satisfactory, and, after prolonged negotiation, the magistrates and council succeeded in buying up the undertakings of the water companies and in obtaining authority to introduce a copious supply from Loch Katrine and other sources in the counties of Perth and Stirling (pp. 57, 58). This was in 1855, and supplementary acts conferring additional powers were obtained in 1859 (p. 77), 1860 (p. 82), 1865 (pp. 102-3), and 1866 (pp. 112-3). The act last-mentioned authorised the construction of works for supplying water from the River Clyde for trading or manufacturing purposes.

For production and supply of gas the citizens were at first dependent on the enterprise of private companies. The Glasgow Light Company was incorporated in 1817 (pp. 66, 67), and the City and Suburban Gas Company in 1843 (pp. 21, 67), and from these respective dates they supplied gas to the city and suburbs till the year 1869, when the magistrates and council acquired both undertakings and obtained the requisite parliamentary authority for continuing the work (pp. 125-8). Powers to acquire additional land for the erection of new works and also to sell existing gas-works were conferred by an amendment act passed in 1871 (p. 138).

In connection with the acquisition of the water and gas undertakings, the Abstract specifies not only numerous conveyances of lands and servitudes purchased by the Corporation but also many sales of surplus properties formerly belonging to the old companies.

In the year 1851 a proposal was brought before the town council for having a public park in the west end of the city. The promoters of this scheme seem originally to have intended to take the chief part in its accomplishment as the town council at that time only undertook to contribute £10,000 to be paid when the park was made over to them in perpetuity on behalf of the public. A different course, however, was adopted, and the purchases of lands were made by the Corporation on their own account. One of the earliest of these purchases consisted of lands on the east side of the River Kelvin, which had been acquired by the Glasgow, Airdrie, and Monklands Junction Railway Company as a site for Glasgow College, the railway company having at that time purchased the old College and grounds in High Street, which they intended to adapt as a terminus to their projected railway; but, through the failure of this scheme, the intended site became available for the purposes of the new park. Other purchases followed, the lands of Kelvingrove being acquired in 1852 (p. 47), and from the latter property the new park took its name. For some years the park kept on the left or east bank of the river, but the College authorities, having sold their High Street buildings to the City of Glasgow Union Railway Company, purchased the lands of Donaldshill and Gilmorehill, situated on the opposite side of the river, and, after sufficient ground was retained as a site for their new buildings, the bulk of the remainder was acquired by the magistrates and council, who appropriated about 20 acres of the ground for extension of the Kelvingrove Park (p. 136).

To meet the legitimate desires of those inhabitants who lived at a considerable distance from Kelvingrove, public parks in other districts were provided. On the south side the lands of Pathhead were acquired in 1857 (p. 66), and Queen's Park was formed thereon. At this stage it was deemed desirable to obtain parliamentary authority for the maintenance and improvement of the parks, as well as of the Galleries of Art and Halls, and by the Public Parks Act of 1859 the Corporation were authorised to levy assessments for these purposes, while other necessary powers were likewise conferred (p. 78), including liberty to feu or sell surplus lands. The numerous feus and sales specified in the Abstract show the extent to which advantage was taken of this provision.

Under authority contained in the Glasgow Improvements Act of 1866 (pp. 109-10) the lands of Kennyhill were acquired for the formation of Alexandra Park (p. 143). But the primary object of this act was the removal of unhealthy houses, the widening of streets, and, in general, the sanitary improvement of the city. This great scheme was expeditiously carried through, the results being regarded as highly beneficial to the community, but the five years originally fixed for the compulsory purchase of old buildings proved inadequate, and an extension of time was conceded by an act of parliament obtained in 1871 (p. 139).

Several acts of parliament deal with the management of the markets and slaughter-houses. In 1845 the beef and mutton markets in King Street and Bell Street, formerly assets of the Common Good, were vested in the magistrates and council as trustees, and new regulations were imposed (p. 27); additional powers were conferred and extensions sanctioned in 1850 (pp. 40, 41); consolidation and amendment of acts followed in 1865, by which time certain of the slaughter-houses had been acquired by the City of Glasgow Union Railway Company and others required to be provided in lieu of those so taken (p. 102); and, in consequence of the large expenditure on improvements and extensions, additional borrowing powers were obtained in 1871 (p. 139). Under the authority conferred by these statutes slaughter-houses were established in Scott Street, Cowcaddens, in 1846; in Moore Street, adjoining the Cattle Market, in 1851; and in Victoria Street, off Eglinton Street, on the south side of the city, in 1866. Following on the passing of the act of 1865 several properties in Graham Square and other streets, adjoining the Cattle Market, were purchased and used partly for an extension of the slaughter-houses and partly for market purposes.

Accommodation in the Court Houses at the Green, to which the municipal officials had removed from the old Tolbooth at the Cross, about the year 1814, was soon found to be too contracted to meet increasing requirements, but more than twenty years elapsed before arrangements were made for obtaining suitable quarters elsewhere. By an act of parliament, passed in 1836, a body of commissioners were authorised to rearrange the Justiciary Court for improving the circuit court and other accommodation,¹ and to purchase properties and erect buildings for the sheriffs, justices of the peace, and municipal authorities, including a court house for the burgh, offices for officials, and a chamber for meetings of the magistrates and council (pp. 4, 5). The buildings erected under this authority faced Wilson Street, Hutcheson Street, and Brunswick Street, and were opened in 1844. The new premises in their turn also became too restricted for the proper conduct of business, and additional purchases of property in Brunswick Street were sanctioned in 1856 (p. 61). Twelve years later the act of 1868 (pp. 122-3) authorised the purchase of the remaining properties up to Ingram Street, and the erection of court houses, halls, and offices. On the completion of these buildings the northern part, fronting Ingram Street, was occupied by the municipal authorities, and the sheriffs, justices of the peace, and others possessed the remainder of the block. An agreement among the several bodies with regard to the portions of the buildings to be respectively occupied by them, and specifying their other rights and obligations, was adjusted in 1872 (p. 146), and confirmed by an act of parliament passed in that year (p. 147). By the act of 1836 provision was made for enlargement of the county and city Bridewell with the view of relieving so much prison space at the court houses, and by an act passed in 1840, at which time Bridewell became vested in the Prison Board of the county of Lanark, authority was given for raising money to liquidate the debt which had been incurred on the work (pp. 13, 14).

Between 1825 and 1840 the Clyde Navigation acts were administered by the magistrates and council, with the addition of five persons interested in trade and navigation and nominated by them. But in the latter year the Trustees were directed to be chosen on a wider basis, the Chamber of Commerce, the Merchants House, the Trades House, the Barony of Gorbals, and the burghs of Calton and Anderston, being for the first time directly represented in the management (p. 15.) New works were at the same time authorised and the acquisition of properties sanctioned. The construction of a Wet Dock or Tidal Basin at Stobcross, the enlargement of the harbour, and the raising of money to meet expenditure, were authorised in 1846 (p. 30), and additional powers for completing the works were conferred by acts passed in 1854 and 1857 (pp. 51, 68). In 1858 the constitution of the Trust was again changed, a board being incorporated under the style of "The Trustees of the Clyde Navigation," consisting of twenty-five members nominated in certain proportions by the Town Council, the Chamber of Commerce, the Merchants House, the Trades House, and the Shipowners and Ratepayers. The limits of the Harbour and River under the charge of the Trust were defined, former statutes were repealed and their provisions consolidated in the one act (p. 73). Subsequent statutes in favour of the Trust were passed in 1864, authorising the laying down of rails or tramways at the quays (p. 100); in 1868, authorising the construction of a graving dock, quays, and other works (pp. 121-2); and in 1870, authorising the construction of a dock or tidal basin, with accessories, on the north side of the Harbour, and allowing the provisions contained in the act of 1846 for the construction of a wet dock at Stobcross and other works to be abandoned (p. 132). An act of parliament passed in 1871 constituted a body of Trustees charged with the maintenance of Lighthouses and Beacons in the River Clyde, with all the necessary powers for the proper performance of their duties (pp. 140-1).

When the bridge over the River Clyde, opposite Jamaica Street, was in course of reconstruction, a temporary wooden bridge for the use of the public was erected over the river, opposite Portland Street, and this structure had proved so useful that when the new bridge was opened in 1836 an act of parliament was obtained authorising the continued maintenance of the temporary bridge for the use of foot passengers (pp. 5, 6). Meanwhile, the old bridge opposite Stockwell Street, though latterly widened and strengthened, was in such a condition as to make its replacement by a structure formed on an improved plan and of suitable dimensions desirable, and accordingly, in 1845, an act of parliament was passed authorising removal of the old bridge and the erection of a new one (pp. 27, 28). By this act, also, all the city bridges over the River Clyde were vested in a new body of Trustees with full powers of management. These powers included authority to replace the Portland Street bridge by one of a more permanent character, within a limited time, but the fixed period having expired without the new bridge being erected renewed authority for its construction was given in 1850 (p. 39). Power to erect a somewhat similar bridge for foot passengers over the river, between the Green (near the Humane Society's House) and the south bank (near the north end of M'Neil Street), was conferred in 1854, previous crossings at that place having been effected by means of open boats (pp. 51, 52). It having been arranged that the management of the two suspension bridges, erected at Portland Street and M'Neil Street respectively, should be entrusted to the general Bridge Trustees, a Consolidation Act uniting the several trusts was passed in 1866 (pp. 113-4). This act also authorised the taking down of Hutchesontown bridge and the rebuilding of it on an improved plan and of suitable width and dimensions. As so rebuilt it was named Albert Bridge, and was opened for traffic in 1871.

Victoria Bridge, erected under authority contained in the act of 1845, and the foundation stone of which was laid in 1851, occupied the site of Glasgow's first stone bridge over the River Clyde, a bridge so old that the century of its construction is not definitely known. It was at the old bridge that a large part of the town's customs was collected, the dues not only on articles crossing the bridge but also on goods and merchandise carried by boats on the river. In Appendix I is reproduced the Table of dues exacted at the old bridge in 1677, and this Table is almost identical with that which, in an 18th century copy, bears the date 1572. From entries in the Council Records it appears that the bridge was in a frail condition before the end of the 16th century, in the year 1671 its southmost arch gave way, and for a long time both before and after that date it was unable to support the passage of ordinary wheeled traffic. In 1774 statutory authority was obtained for having the bridge repaired, widened, and enlarged, and the work was accomplished within the next four years.

The Tramway system was only beginning to get into working order at the close of the period embraced in the Abstract. The promoters of two Bills introduced into Parliament for the construction of Street Tramways, and which two Bills consolidated into one became an act of parliament in 1870, arranged with the Corporation that the latter should be substituted in their place with all the powers conferred by the act for the construction and working of the Tramways (pp. 133-4). Two years later the corporation obtained another act of parliament authorising them to raise money for carrying out the undertaking (p. 149), and, in the interval, they had entered into a Lease with the Glasgow Tramway and Omnibus Company for working the lines for twenty-three years from 1 July, 1871 (pp. 143-4).

At the time of the Disruption there was a proposal to reduce the number of churches for whose maintenance the city's funds were liable (p. 21), and an action of suppression, disjunction, and annexation of the city's churches was raised (p. 25), but was withdrawn before a decision was pronounced. In connection with these proceedings a statement of the revenue, expenditure, and stock account of the corporation was produced, showing that, for the year to 30 September, 1844, expenditure had exceeded revenue to the extent of £765 11s. 9d., (p. 26).

The remarks in the Preface to Glasgow Records, Vol. XI., pp. xix-xxii, on the mode of assessment for the relief of the poor in Glasgow require to be supplemented and corrected by reference to the act of parliament 3 and 4 Vict., c. 93., 1840, whereby it was ordained that, instead of the previous practice of the assessment being imposed on "means and substance," it should thereafter be raised solely from the owners and occupiers of heritages in the ancient and extended royalty (pp. 14, 15). On the passing of the act 8 and 9 Vict., c. 83, constituting Parochial Boards, the properties held by the magistrates and council as administrators of the funds for support of the city's poor were transferred to the parochial board of the city and parish of Glasgow (pp. 20, 34).

In continuation of information supplied in the published volumes of Glasgow Charters and Records, Lists of Ministers, Lord Provosts, and Members of Parliament are appended, these lists like the Abstract itself being brought down to include the year 1872.

1938. DISPOSITION by William Dixon of Govan Colliery, narrating that on 1 May 1811 the corporation of Glasgow received from his father, the late William Dixon, £248 8s., being the price of 1,242 square yards of ground in Gorbals barony sold for use so far as necessary as part of a railway from Govan coal works to the basin of the Ardrossan Canal, and the ground was so used till 22 August 1840, when the Polloc and Govan railway, which was promoted principally by the granter of the disposition and passed through other grounds belonging to the corporation, was opened and the old railway was abandoned. It was then agreed that the disused ground (so far as it passed through the city's lands of Bryceland) should be given up to the magistrates and council at the price for which it was originally purchased, being 4s. per square yard. Therefore William Dixon disposed to the magistrates and council a strip of ground, 12 feet in breadth, formerly occupied by the old railroad, extending to 560 square yards of the lands of Bryceland, bounded on the north-west by the turnpike road leading from the Main Street of Gorbals to Pollockshaws, &c., and on the east by the parish road known by the name of Langside Road. (2) Extracts from Council Minutes, all of which appear in the printed Records, viz., 19 August 1609, prohibiting the laying down of "fulye" at the end of the bridge and the carrying of wattels along the bridge in cars or "sladis" (vol. i., p. 303); 12 May 1655, exempting the feuars of Gorbals from Bridge dues (vol. ii., pp. 313-4); 1 June 1715, exempting the inhabitants of Rutherglen from Bridge dues (vol. iv., p. 536); 29 April 1725, appointing the dues of the Bridge, key and cran to be revised (vol. v., p. 219); 4 February 1765, as to condition of the bridge and prohibiting certain traffic thereon (vol. vii., p. 198); 8 February 1765, report by tradesmen as to the insufficiency of the bridge (Ib., p. 204); 22 March 1765, penalty for passing along the bridge with carts or waggons (Ib., p. 203); and 22 November 1765, authorising the magistrates to grant licenses for the passing of carts, &c., in certain cases (Ib., p. 219). (3) Extracts of the Acts of Council narrating (in terms similar to the act of council printed in vol. vii., pp. 14-19) the setting of the common good, including the dues of the bridge, quay and cran, to tacksmen, for the four years 1762-5. There is also in the bundle the copy of a letter from Archibald M'Gilchrist, depute town clerk, addressed to "Mr John Russell, clerk to the Signett, Edinburgh," then the town's Edinburgh agent, in these terms:—"Glasgow, 21 Feb. 1766. Dear Sir,—In answer to your queries of the 21st in relation to our Bridge, I must first refer to the Town's former condescence which, so far as I can judge, is explicite of the facts enquired into. In time past, so far as can be remembered, every cart, whether belonging to the burghesses of Glasgow and Rutherglen, or inhabitants of Gorbals or elsewhere, were hindred from passing the bridge without a licence first obtained from the Magistrates of Glasgow, and no carts whatever were allowed to pass without licence, and when licence was granted no pontage was required or custom paid. If they gave a small gratuity to the Tacksman it was what he had no right to demand. I am, dear Sir, Your most obedt. humble servt. (Signed) Archibald M'Gilchrist."

Latterly "cran" and quay dues were combined with those of the bridge in the yearly lets to tacksmen. Payment for the "building of a cran at the harbour of Broomielaw" is recorded in 1695 and dues for its use in loading and disloading vessels were fixed on 28 May 1697 (Glasg. Rec., vol. iv., pp. 170, 242).

Parliamentary authority for the erection of a second bridge over the Clyde had been obtained in 1759, and this was followed by an act of parliament containing fuller powers, passed in 1768, but in the interval there seems to have been litigation with regard to customs exigible at the old bridge, the precise nature of which has not been ascertained.]
